A group of nine female directors and their female peers make up the new wave of working-class auteurs, whose films are crying out for a broader narrative than that offered by Netflix and the other streaming giants. What Netflix says about auteurs and streaming Read more Who are these women who are so different to each other, yet who share a common trait of being relatively unknown? They are, as it turns out, Hollywood stars who have watched a lot of indie film, with all the options available on Netflix, and whose careers have been grounded in the kind of small productions that are easier to make and less likely to "self-reinforce". "I'm a studio movie star who really likes indie movies," says Luan Peters, the film's co-writer and director of the crime thriller A Simple Favor. ♦ 82157476af
